

It is important that sections of the spectrum being auctioned by Industry Canada be reserved for new entrants into the wireless communications market. With only three wireless providers currently available for consumers to choose from, there is little competition in the wireless market. This serves consumers poorly because we are provided with a very narrow range of options to choose from. It is essential that part of the spectrum be reserved for new entrants into the wireless market, just as parts of the spectrum were reserved for the three current wireless telecommunication companies when they started out. This is the only way to ensure the growth of a competitive wireless market that would serve the interests of Canadians.

Sincerely,

Moe Luksenberg
